Description	Very clearly a PALO, a species unmistakable in breeding plumage as this bird was. Gray head and back of neck down to the body. Black and white stripes ran up and down the sides of the neck as well as on the edge of the white breast. The black throat ran down to the breast and had a white broken chinstrap cutting across it. The body of the bird was black except for the white checkering pattern of the back. The bill seemed slender and not as heavy as in other loons and was held just slightly up in the air. The red eye could occasionally be seen when the light hit the bird right.
Behavior (be as detailed as possible about what the bird was doing)	When first observed, the bird was diving often, sometimes going under for close to a minute at a time. Later in the day the bird was very docile spending much of its time just floating around and preening a little. Eventually a motor boat passed close by causing the bird to start diving again.
