CURIOUS REPORT

A mystery bird was seen Feb. 17 by two active young birders in Mont Clare, Bob Fetterman and Kevin Hakun, in a stand of two large white pines in BF's yard. They were within 20 feet of the bird, and both had high quality (10x and 8x) binoculars.

Both give same description: yellow head and cheeks, a big black patch at throat "shaped like a rectangle," wing bars, warbler-shaped bill, warbler sized, very active in pine. "The picture in the guide book that looks most like it is the hermit warbler." They are sure it wasn't a black-throated green. Kevin drew a sketch of it, which I've asked to borrow. When I have it I'll send you a copy. What can I say?? They freely admit that a hermit warbler in Pennsylvania in Feb. is impossible (one record in Conn. according to Terres's Encycl. of American Birds)—no date given), but they are very sure about the yellow, unpatterned cheek and "light to medium yellow" on head. The bird flew off, and although they spent an hour—plus subsequent days—looking for it, it was not found again.

I've known these two young men only since last fall, when they presented themselves to me because they knew I birded. They are so full of enthusiasm about birding that I was quite charmed by them. I have actually birded with BF, my near neighbor, only twice, but I was impressed. He is very sharp-eyed. Raptors are his chief love, and he has become somewhat expert at hawk diagnoses. He reads all the literature avidly (recently subscribed to Penna. Birds). He and yet another birding buddy did a subsection of my CBC section this winter and turned in what I considered a very reliable list (all numbers about right; no rarities). BF says he began looking at hawks and ducks as a kid, and has been actively birding for two or three years.
